Uni- (yū·ni), repr. L. ūni- combining form of ūnus one, a single, forming the first element in a number of words with the sense 'having, composed or consisting of, characterized by, etc., one (thing specified by the second element)'. The Latin prefix ūni- (before a vowel ūn-) was employed before or during the classical period in only a few terms, as ūnicolor, ūnigena, ūnimanus, ūniversus, ūnanimus, ūnoculus adjs.; ūniversitās, ūnanimitās sbs. In the post-classical and later language the prefix had a more extensive use, although the recorded instances are not very numerous; they are chiefly adjectival forms, as ūnicalamus, ūnicaulis, ūnicornis, ūniformis, ūnigenitus, ūnijugus, ūniversālis, ūnivocus, etc., ūnanimis. The earliest appearance of the element in English is naturally in words directly adopted from French or Latin, as Unanimity, Unicorn, Uniform a., Unison, Universal a., Universe, University, etc. In more general use it first appears in words adapted from Latin compounds or modelled on these, as univocate (1432–50), univocal (1541), unigenit (a 1568); but it was not until the 17th c. that the prefix obtained much currency, when in addition to normal combs. as unicolorate, unicornous, uniparous, unireme, univalve, etc., such occasional formations as unifoil, unifold, unipresence, unipresent were coined on analogy with other numerical prefixes. In the 18th c. a comparatively small number of new compounds were adapted or formed, as uniangulate, unicapsular, unigenous, unilocular, unisoil, etc. In the 19th c. the element came to be freely employed in the formation of scientific and technical terms, especially in Bot. and Zool., freq. after mod.L. formations as unicapsularis, -cellularis, -foliatus, -labiatus, -lobatus, -nervatus, -nervus, -ovulatus, -sexus, or adapted from F. terms as unicursal, -cuspidé, -lobé, -nerve. The second element in these compounds is thus naturally of Latin origin, but after the prefix had acquired a more extensive use it was not infrequently combined with English forms or words, and has been used occasionally in place of the Greek equivalent Mono-. (The use with English participial forms in -ed was not fully established until the 19th c.)

In scientific works the prefix is sometimes represented by the Arabic numeral, as 1-bracteate, etc.

The older and more important combinations will be found in this Dict. in their alphabetical place as main words.

I. 1. A fabulous and legendary animal usually regarded as having the body of a horse with a single horn projecting from its forehead (cf. 2 note); the monoceros of the ancients.

The unicorn has at various times been identified or confused with the rhinoceros, with various species of antelope, or with other animals having a horn (or horns) or horn-like projection from the head. According to Pliny (Nat. Hist. VIII. xxi. § 31) it had a body resembling that of a horse, the head of a deer, the feet of an elephant, and the tail of a lion, with one black horn projecting 'two cubits' from the middle of the forehead.

The horn of this animal was reputed to possess medicinal or magical properties, esp. as an antidote to or preventive of poison: see Unicorn's horn.
